The book begins with a surreal setting. On the morning of their fifth commemoration, Nick Dunne's wife, Amy, vanishes from their North Carthage, Missouri home. A couple of years prior, they moved there from New York to deal with Nick's mom, who was passing on of disease. Amy, a New Yorker by conception, wasn't excessively excited about this and even felt that she was being taken there without wanting to. Their marriage hasn't precisely been an all-American love story. However, as intense as things have been, it's going to deteriorate. Before the day's over, cops and news groups have attacked Nick's home, analysts have barbecued Nick into fatigue, and Amy's helicopter folks have cleared in from New York to encourage the hunt.

As the days go with no indication of Amy—other than the pieces of information for her yearly commemoration fortune chase, the case's broad media consideration and the overall population's shock put the police under amazing weight to discover a suspect. Sadly, for Nick, they're surrounding him.

The story unwraps with Nick issuing us a marginal frightening depiction of his wife, Amy's head, including its ideal shape and the springs of neurons packaged up in her mind. He says he invests a great deal of energy pondering what she's reasoning about and even who she is, which aren't generally incredible inquiries to be getting some information about somebody you're hitched to. Without a moment's delay, something notices a bit amusement about this relationship.
