Not illustrated. 1895 Excerpt: ...Susie this morning with her sweetest smile. I wondered what was the matter." "It won't do any good," said Helen; "there is only one way possible to make your place quite sure, and that is to give balls, and leave out half your friends--then they will not dare to treat you so themselves." "Mrs. Bertram has certainly found that plan successful, I must admit, particularly as it seems to have been her own invention--she may well be proud of it." "What a dreadful time that pretty little Mrs. Perkins is having," Helen continued. "She looked quite pale this morning. No one has spoken to her yet that I know of." "Nothing in the world against her I suppose," asked Mrs. Lindsay. "Oh, no, only that no one knows her, and, therefore, no one will." "I wonder how long she will stay?" "For good, my dear," said Helen. "She is very rich and I believe clever. Besides I saw Tom Cary walking with her near the beach yesterday. She will be all right next year." "No, not next year--in two perhaps." "What a place it is!" Helen continued, "it really is demoralizing. I don't think my character can bear more than one summer of it." "It has been all over with mine for some time," laughed Mrs. Lindsay. "I can stay till the end of my days." "No, not quite over," said Helen. "I must be truthful if you are not when you persist in denying that you have a heart somewhere concealed under your chiffons--I have not forgotten,"-- "Hush," cried Mrs. Lindsay, "I have forgotten my feelings. They are left behind in town, along with my winter furs. There is no use for them here." They both laughed, and there w...
