Captain Matt Sadler has worked hard to make the status as a pilot for the U.S. Navy Blue Angels. In order to do his job, the world he lives in demands absolute concentration so he has committed himself to his Navy career. He is a man who doesn't like surprises but when he receives the latest letter from home, the news disrupts his daily attentiveness. It interferes with his accuracy of flying to the point where he has become a danger to him and the others on the flight crew. The contents have blindsided him to the point that he gets grounded, also meaning the whole crew cannot fly. The letter contains two photos of a young boy, Greg Cannon. He is obsessed with them and can't believe how much Greg resembles him. His mind instantly travels to the last day home when he told Stacy Cannon that he was leaving. The tears of sadness changed into hugs of consoles to those of passion and they dared step over that line of having sex.....no, made love because he was deeply in love with her. An all-consuming love that was and still is forever burnt into his soul. Could he have fathered a child? He needs to return home to confront her and hopefully find out the truth. Stacy Cannon, the best friend Matt left behind when he joined the Navy has managed to have the worst luck when making decisions in her life. But, the best decision was keeping her child. Being in high school with an unexpected pregnancy was truly difficult but it proved to make her stronger. She struggles but with the help of her parents, has graduated then went to night school to learn photography and within a few years has a prospering business. Dan, her ex-boyfriend returns from college and wants to work things out and after a couple of years asks her to marry him. It's a decision she wonders if is as bad as her others and he later becomes abusive. Placed on a leave of absence, Matt returns home to hopefully find out the truth about the parentage of Greg. What he finds is a strong willed woman who is closed mouth about her son. A woman who recently kicked out her fiancée who has left bruises on her. This makes her not ready for a man in her life, or can he get her to change her mind once he reveals his secret he kept for over twelve years and perhaps they can find the happiness they both long for?
